Last weekend, I visited an exhibition titled "Hà Nội in the Subsidy Period" at the city museum. It recreated life in Hà Nội from the late 1970s to the mid-1980s, when goods were scarce and ration coupons were needed for everyday necessities. The rooms were decorated with old furniture, radios and bicycles. There were displays of food coupons, clothing cards and even soap bars, all of which were the items people used during that difficult time. Walking through the exhibition, I saw many photos of crowded streets and markets where people waited in long lines to buy rice or meat. There were also first-hand accounts from residents describing how families shared small apartments and prepared simple meals with limited ingredients. Many people became resourceful, making toys from recycled materials and fixing broken items instead of buying new ones. A guide explained that the government distributed most goods, and families learned to save every little thing. Despite the hardships, people remembered the period with a sense of pride in how they stayed strong and helped each other.

sense of community and mutual support. Children played together in the streets, and neighbours helped each other. The exhibition ended with a short film showing Hà Nội's transformation after the subsidy period, a city growing more modern and dynamic, but highlighting how the memories of cooperation and solidarity remained important to many people today.
